Biased language makes it seem that one thing or person is better or worse than another. Examples include, “men are better than woman”, “young people are better than older people” and “the rich are better than the poor”. Even when the bias is not as explicit as these, the use of certain words still convey this impression. “A good manager enforces his instructions consistently” is biased in favour of the male gender.

Similarly, the statements, “a good nurse exhibits good rapport with her patients” is biased against the male gender. In the former case, the statement suggest that managers are usually men. In the later case, a reader takes away the impression that nurses are usually women. Gone are the days when users of language were not sensitive to gender relationships. In contemporary times, speakers do so at their own peril. They may be branded male chauvinists or feminists in the worst sense of the words if their styles consistently show a gender preference. Language that is neutral is a solution in the matter.

Answer the following questions

1. Which is not an example of biased language? A. men are better than women B. human beings often can be very kind C. young people are better than older people D. the rich are kinder than the poor
2. “A good manager enforces his instructions consistently” is biased against the female gender because it suggests that A. female managers are hated B. female managers cannot enforce instructions C. managers are usually men D. all male managers are good

Education is a major factor in determining your status, pay and job. Although university degree are no longer absolute guarantees of high income, there are still incentive to earn the degrees. Specific university degrees re status symbol. Indeed they place those who hold them in a certain high class in the society. In recent times, even the non-graduate of a university wants to marry a lady who is a graduate of one of our universities. For the ladies, a university degree qualifies them for desirable husbands. For the men, they want university women who will above other advantages be great teachers of their children at home. Little wonder than our universities are bursting with students and obtaining admissions into them are great wars of survival. Prospective students who fail to get admission into the regular programmes do so through sandwich, Continuing Education and Open University Programmes. In these later cases the students may study even while working. The ultimate solution lies in expanding facilities, the establishment of more universities and the training of academics for a great job that is beneficial to everyone.
